ABSTRACT

The lists presented in this volume include individuals and institutions that may serve as resources to educators developing or modifying programs to assist beginning teachers. These lists were generated by contracts made in the course of the study of induction programs for beginning teachers. The first list is of locations and directors of the four case study sites the Educational Testing Service staff visited. They represent exemplary programs serving beginning teachers and may serve as resources for other educators who are developing or modifying similar programs. The second list is of the locations and directors of the 20 exemplary programs described in the study. The final list is of people who provided information, nominations of exemplary programs, and support to the study. They represent a variety of institutions and agencies interested in the problems of beginning teachers. (JD)

PREFACE

The Study of Induction Programs for Beginning Teachers began as an investigation of fifth-year post-baccalaureate teacher internship programs in which the intern taught half-time while completing an academic program leading to a master's degree. After the start of the study, it became clear that most teacher "intern" programs in the United States did not fit this model. The focus of the study was expanded to an examination of the problems of beginning teachers. The critical questions in this investigation are:

- What are the problems of beginning teachers?
- What kinds of programs have facilitated the solution of these problems?
- What are the consequences of failing to solve these problems in terms of achieving teacher effectiveness and stimulating a career of progressive professional development?

Three approaches were used to gather information on these issues: a review of the relevant literature, the identification of and visits to programs designed to assist beginning teachers, and a review of the evaluation reports of the programs. Twenty-four programs were examined in depth as part of the study. Of these, four were site visits. Educators throughout the nation who are concerned about the problems of beginning teachers were consulted.

The final report of this study consists of four volumes. The first volume discusses the problems and issues covered by the study, describes the methodology utilized in the study, and provides a series of recommendations for teacher educators and policy makers. Comprehensive descriptions of exemplary programs for beginning teachers are included in the second volume. The digest of programs is intended to assist educators who either wish to implement or improve induction programs. The third volume provides a review of the literature. The names and locations of educators interested and involved in programs for beginning teachers are provided in the fourth volume.

The project was directed by Project Co-Directors, Dr. Frederick J. McDonald, Senior Research Scientist, Division of Educational Research and Evaluation, Educational Testing Service, Princeton, New Jersey, 08541, and Dr. Patricia Elias, Director of Research and Advisory Services, Educational Testing Service, Berkeley, California, 94704. Information about the study and reports are available from either.

The study was funded by the National Institute of Education (Contract No. 400-78-0069). Dr. Joseph Vaughn, the Project Officer, deserves major credit for exercising the leadership and having the vision to expand the study.

INTRODUCTION

Volume IV includes lists of people who might serve as resources to educators who are developing or modifying programs to assist beginning teachers. The first list presented is the list of the locations and directors of the four case study sites ETS staff visited. They represent exemplary programs serving beginning teachers. The process for identifying exemplary programs was essentially one of peer nomination. That process is described more fully in Volume II of this study.

Three of the case study sites are associated with institutions of higher education and are in the purview of a school district. Two are described as "Intern" programs, but in all instances the beginning teachers in these programs were functioning as "real" teachers with sustained responsibility for a given group of pupils as well as the other perquisites and responsibilities of any beginning teacher.

The second list is of the locations and directors of the twenty exemplary sites also described in the study. In these cases, we did not have the opportunity to visit each site. However, the directors supplied ETS staff with a good deal of information by phone and in writing. District, state and university supported programs are included.

We found all of these people dedicated to what they were doing and eager not only to share but to exchange information. We recommend them as valuable human resources to anyone contemplating a support program for beginning teachers. Collectively they represent, in our opinion, the beginning of a network of educators with expertise that could be tapped to build effective programs anywhere in the nation.

The last and longest list is that of the persons we contacted during the life of the study. The people provided information, nominations of exemplary programs and support to the study. The list, then, is that of educators from a variety of institutions and agencies who are interested in the problems of beginning teachers. The list is organized geographically to make it easy for program planners to identify and locate people with similar interests in their state or region of this country.
